Fear evokes many feelings. I have elected to subject the reader to a compendium of twists and turns that each casts a shadow of a doubt into many corners of the reader's brain. The story is based on facts that any reader can investigate on their own. My tale is simply to take the reader down a path of absolute truth with shadows that cross it. What imagery the story creates therefor becomes personal to the reader. What do you fear most from Big Business and the Under-Government?

I grew up in the small town of Lacey, Washington on the outskirts of the State Capitol of Olympia. I was engaged in sports throughout my school years, focusing on track or soccer. At North Thurston High School, I was encouraged to write and was given a Smith Corona manual typewriter as a gift. I can thank my Mom and Dad, and my two Sisters for setting a bar often higher than I could reach. Numerous teachers at North Thurston were very inspirational, as were a few of my professors at Washington State University.

From my senior year in High School until just a few years ago I was involved in either public or private fire protection, serving on numerous boards and commissions across Washington State. I was selected to attend a specialized program for Fire and Arson Investigators, and went through the Seattle Police Academy where I made many contacts with the Seattle SWAT Team. In those years I have been knocked flat by electricity, nearly drowned, crushed, incinerated and beaten up on an aid call saving a man's life. It seemed a natural extension of all these things to write about them.

Secret agent Neah Bey has a plan to slow the growth of the global populace. Blessed with brains and experience with spycraft, he intends to preserve a higher quality of life for all. But he didn't count on an attack from a proxy of the Church, with a history almost as devious as his own. Bey soon finds himself on the run with his wife Ione, they must face a battle against an enemy they don't know and have never met.

Former cop Del Omak was drifting through life until a phone call changes his life forever and transforms him into an unwilling agent of the Church. Ordered to bring down Neah Bey, he finds the job is harder than he had anticipated. But failure is not an option, and Del intends to get his man.

In this high-paced thriller, only one man can stop Neah Bey. Who will win this battle of spy against spy?

Neah Bey returns in an all new world ending conspiracy! Imagine artifacts exist that describe perfectly and completely that this is the second time around for the human race. What will governments and financial institutions do to prevent the artifacts from being revealed to the world's population? Who will want them destroyed, and why? Who gains from their exposure? Neah and his associates race from the Antarctic to the Smithsonian to the forest lands of Eastern Washington to secure the mysterious pieces wrenched from the Antarctic and stolen from museums around the world.

In the end, who will you believe?
